GOOD HOESES. 13 Once a company is organized to buy a horse the best horseman of the group should be delegated to make the purchase and unless he is thoroughly competent he should enlist the services of some disinterested party who knows a good stallion and knows the market value of stallions. It is the common belief of many farmers that a stallion has no fixed market value, but a buying trip out with an experienced and successful dealer will show one that the stud horse has just about as well fixed a value as the work horse or the beef steer when put upon the market. In going about the purchase of a stallion one should take plenty of time and begin looking some weeks ahead of the time when the horse will be needed. A change of locality affects the welfare of a horse more than any other animal for sometime after the change is made and it is better when possible to buy the stallion near home for in most cases if he is already acclimated he will do better than if given a long freight haul and change of climate. Having decided upon the breed and secured a good stallion he cannot be expected to give good colts and get a high percentage of mares in foal unless he is given plenty of exercise and proper feeds. He should not be allowed to go hungry nor should he be maintained in an...
