I was sent to a most respectable school under the charge of Mr. E., one of the best of men, and an excellent scholar, where I remained three years, and prepared for college, but at that time I took a wild notion in my head of going to sea, which almost broke the hearts of my dear parents, and they endeavored all in their power to persuade me from such a mad career, but I would not listen to their kind and affectionate advice, (the Devil leading me on) and after my parents found that all their entreaties were of no avail they consented to my going a voyage, trusting that if I was spared I would return and relinquish such a life. My dear mother then began to make preparations for my departure, and to get me such...
