It lies at the eastern foot of the Sierra Nevada, which forms a dividing wall between the Pacific Slope and the Great Basin, and belongs, botanically as well as topographically, to the latter region. The Sierra Nevada, forming the south and southwest boundary of the valley, rises some 3,700 feet above the lake level, in Thompson s Peak, and presents a very steep, pine-clad front, with but little stream sculpture. The mountain chain on the north and northeast has a more gradual slope, destitute of timber, and attains its highest point at Hot Spring Peak, some 7,600 feet above the sea. The lake bed is about 4,000 feet above sea level. The floor of the valley dips lightly from all sides towards the lake, - which occupies its southwestern portion, - but has otherwise a very even, almost level surface. The valley is about fifty miles in length, east and west, and some twenty-five in width at its widest part Though the waters of the lake now occupy an area only sixteen miles long by twelve wide, they appear to have covered the whole of the valley floor at one time, for a series of distinct shore lines is noticeable along the mountain sides. Honey Lake formerly had a channel connecting it with Pyramid Lake, which lies to the southeast, and it appears to be still connected with Eagle Lake and Horse Lake on the northeast, from verbal information obtained...
